SHANGHAI—Already at its lowest point in more than 3½ years, China's stock market suffered its worst week in nearly a year.

Investors and analysts said there wasn't a single cause for the week's 4.6% selloff, instead citing a combination of weak manufacturing data, an intensifying diplomatic row between China and Japan over disputed islands, and uncertainty about changes in the country's top leaders expected in coming weeks.

The Shanghai Composite Index was barely changed Friday, up 1.85 points or 0.1%, at 2026.69. That ended the market's worst week since October. On Thursday, the market closed at its lowest point since Feb. 2, 2009. This year, it has dropped 7.9%, following a 22% decline last year. Unless the market rebounds, this would mark the third year that Shanghai was among the world's worst performers.

"The market is pessimistic about China's real economy and worried about a further deterioration in corporate earnings," said Jerry Lou, chief strategist at Morgan Stanley Huaxin Securities. While the Chinese economy is still expanding strongly, though more slowly than in the past, corporate earnings have fallen 2.7% this year, largely due to rising wages, according to analysts at RBS. A widely tracked gauge of Chinese manufacturing activity released Thursday marked the 11th consecutive month of weakness.

Hanging over the market is the uncertainty surrounding China's once-in-a-decade leadership transition, which will take place this fall.

"The political stalemate is one of the reasons to explain the recent steep selloff in stocks. People are always more circumspect in the face of uncertainties," said Amy Lin, a senior analyst at Capital Securities.

One fear among investors is that Chinese companies, many of which own stakes in one another, could trim or unload those holdings to capture gains and boost their own earnings, Mr. Lou said.

LONDON—Flush with cash but wary of making any more bad loans, U.K. banks are buying back their own bonds, potentially reinforcing criticism that they aren't doing enough to help the economy out of recession.

Lloyds Banking Group PLC last week offered to repurchase up to £10 billion ($16.2 billion) in senior debt, adding to a £4.6 billion transaction in July. Barclays PLC on Monday said that it had agreed to pay about £1.8 billion to repurchase bonds, while Royal Bank of Scotland Group PLC completed a £4.15 billion deal.

The purchases are unusual because they involve senior bonds that trade at face value or higher. The same banks and many others in Europe have bought back riskier junior bonds at big discounts to face value, a practice that allows them to book gains and boost capital reserves.

All three banks have cash to spare, after shoring up liquidity this year to withstand the euro-zone debt crisis and downgrades to their credit ratings. Politicians and the Bank of England want the country's banks to jump-start the economy and make more loans to households and businesses, but lenders say they are doing what they can and that there aren't enough credit-worthy customers. New loans also mean setting aside capital to cover potential losses.

Bond buybacks have looked like a better option. Even after paying a premium to entice investors, banks can improve their profitability by getting rid of the relatively expensive funding and cut the size of their future interest-rate bills. Analysts say the deals demonstrate how far the U.K. banking sector has come since 2008, when a dearth of capital pushed RBS and Lloyds into state hands and Barclays raised emergency funds.

"Banks are showing their rude health and the strength of their liquidity positions," said Michael Symonds, a credit analyst at Daiwa Securities. "They could make loans to the real economy but here banks see real risks if they look at the uncertain economic outlook and the capital expense with granting a new loan."

The banks declined to comment and pointed to statements made previously. RBS Chief Executive Stephen Hester in August said that his bank is "trying to lend as much as it prudently can." Lloyds CEO Antonio
